The National Charity League's Lubbock Chapter presented its high school class of young women at a formal dinner held recently at Lubbock Country Club. Most of the honorees had been working as volunteers for nonprofit agencies since seventh grade.

The mother-daughter project is designed to begin teaching seventh-graders how to give back to the community, and to teach them how to be leaders. It continues through their senior year.

Verna Kimble of the chapter said this year's high school seniors have worked for 25 organizations, including Ronald McDonald House, Habitat for Humanity, the Salvation Army and the Junior League of Lubbock.

"It is a good time to foster relationships with the mothers and daughters. This was established nationally in 1925," Kimble said.

"The presentation dinner is an opportunity for these girls to see how much they are appreciated as volunteers in giving back."
